

ABUSE PROBE SCHOOL HAS LINKS TO DUNBLANE KILLER

MURDERER: Hamilton

JUDGE: Lord Cullen

POLICE are probing claims that boys were sexually abused at a military school linked to Dunblane killer Thomas Hamilton.

The allegations concern Stirling-shire's Queen Victoria School, which boasts Prince Philip as its patron.

They come from a former housemaster who says pupils were regularly preyed on by a vice ring of toffs.

Hamilton – allegedly picked up their victims in flash limos and dropped them off the next day, obviously-distressed.

But, says Glenn Harrison, the military code at the Dunblane school meant the kids kept quiet about their ordeal.

The full horror emerged when some of the victims broke down and told him their sickening tales of sustained sexual abuse. Glenn says one boy was so seriously assaulted in one overnight orgy that he later tried to kill himself.

His claims, now being investigated by Central Scotland cops, could embarrass the original inquiry led by Lord Cullen.

Scotland's top judge heard how 43-year-old Hamilton killed 16 pupils and a teacher at Dunblane Primary in 1996.

Three witnesses told of the disgraced scoutmaster's links with the QVS, including organising camping trips for pupils.

But Glenn says he was never called to give his inside info – even though he'd approached the authorities several times.

In his written statement to the police, Glenn, who now lives on the Shetland Isle of Unst, says: "My allegations were never investigated. They never interviewed me. I did not exist."

Campaigners say the original probe ignored the QVS's links with some of the biggest names in the Scottish judiciary.

Central's CID said last night: "We will shortly decide what action is required."
